FAQ

Q1: What if the trustee refuses to provide the accounting?

A1: If the trustee refuses to provide the accounting, you should seek legal counsel immediately. An attorney can advise you on your legal options, which may include filing a petition with the probate court to compel the trustee to provide the accounting. This petition would need to demonstrate a clear violation of their fiduciary duty.

Q2: How long do I have to request an accounting?

A2: There isn't a strict statute of limitations on requesting an accounting, but unreasonable delays can weaken your position. It's best to request an accounting promptly if you suspect any irregularities or if you need the information for personal financial planning.

Q3: What if the trust documents don't explicitly mention accounting procedures?

A3: Even without explicit mention in the trust document, California law still requires trustees to provide accountings to beneficiaries upon request. This is based on the trustee's fiduciary duty to be transparent and accountable for their management of the trust assets.

Q4: What should I do if the accounting seems inaccurate or incomplete?

A4: If you suspect inaccuracies or omissions, consult with a legal professional. They can review the accounting documents and advise you on the appropriate course of action, which might include requesting clarification from the trustee or pursuing further legal remedies.

Q5: Can I demand an accounting more frequently than annually?

A5: While annual accounting is often sufficient, you can request more frequent accountings if you have specific reasons, such as concerns about the trustee's management or significant changes in the trust's assets. However, the court might deem excessive demands unreasonable.

Q6: Are there costs associated with obtaining an accounting?

A6: Typically, the trustee is responsible for covering the costs associated with preparing and providing the accounting. However, if you have to pursue legal action to obtain it, you may incur legal fees.

Q7: What constitutes a "reasonable" timeframe to provide the accounting?

A7: A reasonable timeframe depends on the complexity of the trust and the amount of documentation involved. 30-60 days is often considered reasonable, but this can be negotiated depending on circumstances.

Q8: Can I request an accounting even if I'm not a current beneficiary but have a future interest in the trust?

A8: Your rights to an accounting depend on the terms of the trust. If the trust document provides for future interests, or you have a vested right to future distribution, you may have the right to request accounting, even if your beneficial enjoyment hasn't commenced. Legal counsel can determine your standing in this matter.
